
Sharp’s tales of the West inspired Blumenschein and Phillips to tour the area. When a wagon wheel broke outside of Taos, Blumenschein took it into town on horseback to be repaired. He wrote, “No artist had ever recorded the New Mexico I was now seeing. No writer had ever written down the smell of this air or the feel of that morning’s sky. I was receiving… the first great unforgettable inspiration of my life.” He decided to settle there and was soon joined by a group of fellow artists.

In 1915 they formed the Taos Society of Artists “to promote and stimulate the practical expressions of art—to preserve and promote the native art.” The artists developed abiding bonds with the people of Taos Pueblo who became their models and their friends. Impressed by their integrity, they later became advocates for Native rights against the harsh policies of the federal government.

The Couse-Sharp Historic Site in Taos is hosting an exhibition, Full Circle: Taos Pueblo Contemporary through November 3 in the Luna Chapel. The building was built in 1835 as a family chapel. Sharp purchased it in 1909 and converted it for his studio.

The site’s executive director and curator, Davison Koenig, says, “TSA artists became strong advocates for Native rights and sovereignty. The exhibition Full Circle honors those relationships and the many artists from Taos Pueblo who continue to redefine Native art and identity.”

John Suazo (Hunter Watching) has been sculpting since the 1970s. He draws on the cultural traditions of Taos Pueblo and simplifies the human and animal forms. He has said, “Each piece is a reflection of my inner self. A lot of my work involves stories I’ve heard from older people in my tribe. I never plan a sculpture, but when I finish it, to my amazement, it somehow perfectly fits a story I’ve heard from my grandfather.”

Suazo’s grandfather was the inspiration for the great novel The Man Who Killed the Deer by Frank Waters.

4. Sean Rising Sun Flanagan (Taos), Thunderbird, 2018, steel
The family of Sean Flanagan (Rising Sun) has run the Wahleah Taos Pueblo Gallery for generations. Known for his traditional drums—a skill he learned from his grandfather and his uncle—he also makes stylized sculptures. In Full Circle he is represented by Thunderbird, a cut metal sculpture with elements of Art Deco and Native symbols.

Maria Samora’s elegant jewelry is highly sought after. Growing up in Taos she felt she had no talent for art although her mother was a seamstress and a jeweler and her brother went to IAIA. When her interest began to awaken she apprenticed to G. Phil Poirier who inspired her aesthetically and mechanically. She says, “My training has given me the technique to actually produce what’s in my head.” Her work has begun to incorporate geometric Native patterns.

Ira Lujan interprets traditional pottery shapes and designs in glass—and takes off from there. He is represented in Full Circle by a stunning 90-inch glass sculpture Feathers and Antlers that hangs like a chandelier from the gallery ceiling.
